INTRODUCTION

1. Our intention has been to seek a deeper understanding of Ministry which is consonant with biblical teaching and with the traditions of our common inheritance, and to express in this document the consensus we have reached.* This Statement is not designed to be an exhaustive treatment of Ministry, but attempts to investigate areas of agreement relating to points which have seemed to divide us in the past.

2. Within the Roman Catholic Church and the Anglican Communion there exists an ordained ministry amongst a diversity of forms of ministerial service. Of more specific ways of service, some are undertaken unofficially while others may receive a mandate from ecclesiastic authorities. The ordained ministry can only be rightly understood within this broader context.

MINISTRY IN THE LIFE OF THE CHURCH

3. The life and self-offering of Christ perfectly express what it is to serve God and man. All Christian ministry, whose purpose is always to build up the Koinonia, flows and takes its shape from this source and model. The communion of men with God and with each other requires their reconciliation. This reconciliation, accomplished by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, is being realised in the life of the Church through the response of faith. While the Church itself is still in process of sanctification, its mission is nevertheless to be the instrument by which this reconciliation in Christ is proclaimed, his love manifested, and the means of salvation offered to men.

4. The Christian Church began with the communities where the apostles exercised their ministry. It is difficult to deduce, from the New Testament use of "apostle" for the Twelve, Paul and others, a precise portrait of an apostle, but two primary features of the original apostolate are clearly discernible: a special relationship with the historical Christ, and a commission from him to the Church and the world. (Mark 3:14). The Church is apostolic not only because its faith and life must reflect the witness to Jesus Christ given in the early Church by the apostles, but also because it is charged to continue in the apostles' commission to communicate to the world what it has received. Within the whole history of mankind the Church is to be the community of reconciliation.

5. All ministries are used by the Holy Spirit for the building up of the Church to be this reconciling community for the glory of God and the salvation of men (Eph. 4: 11-13). Within the New Testament ministerial actions are varied and functions not precisely defined. Explicit emphasis is given to the proclamation of the Word and the preservation of apostolic doctrine, the care of the flock, and the example of Christian living. At least by the time of the Pastoral Epistles and I Peter, some ministerial functions are discernible in a more exact form. The evidence suggests that with the growth of the Church the importance of these functions led to their being gradually located in specific officers of the community. Since the Church is built up by the Holy Spirit primarily but not exclusively through these ministerial functions, some form of recognition and authorisation is already required in the New Testament period for their legitimate exercise in the name of Christ. Here we can see elements which will remain at the heart of what today we call ordination.

6. The New Testament shows that ministerial office played an essential part in the life of the Church in the first century, and we believe that the provision of a ministry of this kind is part of God's design for his people. Normative principles governing the purpose and function of the ministry are already found in the New Testament documents. The early Churches may well have had considerable diversity in the structure of pastoral ministry, and development is already apparent in the New Testament itself. The terms 'bishop' and 'presbyter' could be applied to men with identical or very similar functions. The emergence of the threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter, and deacon required a longer period than the apostolic age (though not as long as the emergence of the New Testament canon itself). Since the beginning of the second century the ministry has retained this threefold structure.

THE ORDAINED MINISTRY

7. The Christian community exists for the glory of God through the fulfilment of the Father's purpose. All Christians are called to serve this purpose by their life of prayer and surrender to divine grace, and by their careful attention to the needs of all human beings. They should witness to God's compassion for all mankind and his concern for justice in the affairs of men. They should offer themselves to God in praise and worship and devote their energies to bring men into the fellowship of Christ's people, and so under his rule of love. The goal of the ordained ministry is to serve this priesthood of all the faithful. Like any human community the Church requires a focus of leadership and unity, which the Holy Spirit provides in the ordained ministry. Even if this ministry assumes various patterns to meet the varying needs of those whom the Church is seeking to serve, it is the role of the minister to co-ordinate the activities of the Church's fellowship and to promote what is necessary and useful for the Church's life and mission.

8. In the New Testament a variety of images is used to describe the functions of this minister. He is servant, both of Christ and of the Church. As herald and ambassador he is an authoritative representative of Christ who proclaims his message of reconciliation. As a teacher he explains and applies the Word of God to the community. As a shepherd he exercises pastoral care and guides the flock. He is a steward who may only provide for the household of God what belongs to Christ. He is to be an example both in holiness and in compassion. The ordained minister discerns the Spirit-given diversity of the Church's life and promotes its unity.

9. As essential element in the ordained ministry is its responsibility for 'oversight' (episcopo). This responsibility involves fidelity to the apostolic faith, its embodiment in the life of the Church today, and its transmission to the Church of tomorrow. Presbyters are joined with the bishop in his oversight of the church and in the ministry of the Word and the sacraments; they are given authority to preside at the Eucharist and to pronounce absolution. Deacons, although not so empowered, are associated with bishops and presbyters in the ministry of Word and sacrament, and assist in oversight. The commission in ordination carries with it the ministry of preaching the word. The ministers are called to be messengers, watchmen, and stewards of the Lord; and in the original mission and witness recorded in Holy Scripture lies the source and ground of their preaching and authority. They therefore have a responsibility both to the people under their pastoral care and to the gospel itself, and lead the community in the service of humanity (above para. 6). Because the sacraments are sacraments of faith, their place in their celebration must be seen as one with the ministry of the word, since through both the Christian meets the living Word of God. Their responsibility in the Christian community involves them in being not only the persons who normally administer baptism, but also the ones who admit converts to the communion of the faithful and restore those who have fallen away. The authority to pronounce God's forgiveness of sin, given to them at their ordination, is exercised by them to assist Christians to a closer communion with God and with their fellow men through Christ and to assure them of God's continuing love and mercy.

10. To proclaim reconciliation in Christ and to manifest his reconciling love belongs to the continuing mission of the Church. The central act of worship, the Eucharist, is the memorial of that reconciliation and nourishes the Church's life for the fulfilment of its mission. Hence it is right that he who has oversight in the Church and is the focus of its unity presides at the celebration of the Eucharist. Evidence as early as Ignatius shows that at least in some Churches, the man exercising this oversight presided at the Eucharist and no other could do so without his consent. (Smyrn. 8:1).

11. The priestly sacrifice of Jesus was unique, as is also his continuing High Priesthood. Despite the fact that in the New Testament ministers are never called 'priests' (hierais),* Christians came to see the priestly role of Christ reflected in these ministers and used priestly terms in describing them. Because the eucharist is the memorial of the sacrifice of Christ, the action of the presiding minister in reciting again the words of Christ at the Last Supper and distributing to the assembly the holy gift is seen to stand in a sacramental relation to what Christ himself did in offering his own sacrifice. So our two traditions commonly use priestly terms in speaking about the ordained ministry. Such language does not imply any negation of the once-for-all sacrifice of Christ by addition, continuation or repetition. There is in the eucharist a memorial (anamnesis) of the totality of God's reconciling action in Christ, who through his minister presides at the Lord's Supper and gives himself sacramentally. It is because the eucharist is central in the Church's life that the essential nature of the Christian ministry, however this may be expressed, is most clearly seen in its celebration; for, in the eucharist, thanksgiving is offered to God, the gospel of salvation is proclaimed in word and sacrament, and the community is knit together as one body in Christ. Christian ministers are members of this redeemed community. Not only do they share through baptism in the priesthood of the people of God, but they are - particularly in presiding at the eucharist - representative of the whole Church in the fulfilment of its priestly vocation of self-offering to God as a living sacrifice (Romans 12:1). Nevertheless their ministry is not an extension of the common Christian priesthood but belongs to another realm of the gifts of the Spirit. It exists to help the Church to be "a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people, to declare the wonderful deeds of him who called them out of darkness into his marvellous light" (1 Peter 2:9).

* In the English language the word 'priest' is used to translate two distinct New Testament words, hierous which belongs to the cultic order and presbyteros which designates an elder in the community.

VOCATION AND ORDINATION

12. Entry into this apostolic and God-given ministry, which serves and signifies the unity of the local churches in themselves and with one another through time and space, is by ordination. Every individual act of ordination is therefore an expression of the continuing apostolicity and catholicity of the whole church. The Risen Christ calls and ordains, and each act of ordination binds the church and ministry to the revelation accomplished in him. Just as the original apostles did not choose themselves but were chosen and Commissioned by Jesus, so those who are ordained are called by Christ in the church and through the church. Not only is their vocation from Christ but their qualification for exercising such a ministry is the gift of the Spirit: "Our sufficiency is from God, who has qualified us to be ministers of a new covenant, not in a written Code but in the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3: 4-6). This is expressed in ordination, when the bishop prays God to grant the gift of the Holy Spirit and lays hands on the candidate as the outward sign of the gifts bestowed.* Because ministry is in and for the community and because ordination is an act in which the whole church of God is involved, this prayer and laying on of hands take place within the context of the eucharist.

13. In this sacramental act, the "gift of God", which

Paul reminds Timothy to rekindle in him (2 Tim., 1:6), is bestowed upon the ministers, with the promise of divine grace for their work and for their sanctification; the ministry of Christ is presented to them as a model of their own; and the Spirit seals those whom he has chosen and consecrated. As Christ has united the church inseparably with himself, and as God calls all the faithful to life-long discipleship, so the gifts and calling of God to the ministers are irrevocable (cf. Rom., 11:29). For this reason, ordination is unrepeatable in both our Churches.

14. Both presbyters and deacons are ordained by the bishop.

In the ordination of a presbyter, the presbyters present join with the bishop in the laying on of hands, thus signifying the shared nature of the commission entrusted to them. In the ordination of a bishop, other bishops lay hands upon him, as they request the gift of the Spirit for his ministry and receive him into their ministerial fellowship. Because they are entrusted with the oversight of other churches, this participation in his ordination signifies that this new bishop and his church are within the communion of churches. Moreover, because their churches are rooted in the teaching of the apostles, and because they have themselves been introduced into the episcopal college through ordination, their participation also ensures the historical continuity

* Anglican use of the word 'sacrament' with reference to ordination is limited by the distinction drawn between the 'two sacraments of the Gospel' and the 'five commonly called sacraments.' Article XXV does not deny these latter the name 'sacrament', but differentiates between them and the 'two sacraments ordained by Christ' described in the catechism as 'necessary to salvation' for all men.

of this church with the apostolic church and of its bishop with the original apostolic ministry. The communion of the churches in faith and holiness, through time and space, is thus symbolised and maintained in the bishop. In all this are comprised the essential features of what is meant by ordination in the apostolic succession.
